

Media release – 18 April 2018

Young couch surfers worse off than those sleeping rough, new research reveals

Youth Homelessness Matters Day is on Wednesday 18 April. Melbourne youth homelessness experts will gather at a YHMD event at Frontyard Youth Services. Event details at end of media release.

Preliminary findings from a Queensland-based research project is showing evidence that couch surfing can be just as damaging and traumatising as rough sleeping for young people.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare data shows that 30,585 couchsurfers sought assistance from homelessness services last financial year, one-third of them being 12-24 year olds.

The research, conducted by Brisbane Youth Service and Griffith Criminology Institute, with preliminary findings published in Council to Homeless Person's Parity magazine, looked at the experiences of 864 young people, aged 12 – 25 years old, who were experiencing homelessness over a 12 month period and focused on the mental health of two groups: couch surfers and rough sleepers.

It found that young couch surfers had higher rates of both suicide risk and rates of self-harming behavior. Additionally, couch surfers were twice as likely to describe their mental health as poor than the young people sleeping rough.

The research also found that although couch surfers and rough sleepers self-reported similar rates of recent drug and alcohol use, couch surfers were less likely to label their current use as problematic. Additionally, couch surfers reported that they received the lowest levels of support from community-based organisations. Combined, these two findings could suggest that couch surfers are less likely or feel less able to seek help from the services they need.

“Envisioning couch surfing as an extended sleep-over with a friend has contributed to the perception that it is a ‘safer’ form of homelessness, or even not a form of youth homelessness at all. This research blows that misconception out of the water,” said Council to Homeless Persons CEO, Jenny Smith.

Being coerced to provide sex for a place to sleep – survival sex

Worryingly, the research found that young people couch surfing were far more likely to be women or LGBTIQ. Seventy per cent of couch surfers in the study were found to be young women.

“These findings suggest that we need to better understand the realities of what young people experience while couch surfing. It is possible that some young women and gay youth are exchanging survival sex for a place to stay and there may be multiple other psychological stressors in play in couch surfing environments” said Rhianon Vichta, Research and Evaluation Coordinator for Brisbane Youth Service.

“There are clear and concerning indications that finding a temporary bed in someone else’s house for the night is not necessarily a safer or healthier alternative to sleeping rough”, said Ms Vichta.

“We are continuing our research to better understand the reasons why this is the case. It is important, however, for services to stay focused on the reality that a home is much more than a bed and we need to be consistently working towards stable and safe accommodation options for young people”.

Katie Hail-Jares, post-doctorate researcher from Griffith Criminology Unit and co-researcher with Brisbane Youth Service, pointed out, “Our research should not be interpreted as a call to turn young people out onto the streets, but that each young person’s situation needs to be treated individually, rather than assuming that any roof is better than no roof.”

The Council to Homeless Persons says couch surfing should be viewed with the same seriousness as other forms of homelessness, and needs specific policy responses, with a particular focus on affordable accommodation for young people on low incomes who can’t live at home.

“Early intervention is critical in preventing young people from falling into a cycle of homelessness that can last a lifetime. Young people aged 12-24 make up 24% of our homeless population, but are most often hidden from view, so easier to ignore.”

The Australian Institute of Health and Wellbeing (2018) reports that more than 30,000 people presented to homelessness services who were couch surfing in the 2016-17 year, and that one-third of those couchsurfers were aged 15-24.

Media enquiries: Lanie Harris, Council to Homeless Persons, 0418 552 377 or lanie@chp.org.au

Youth Homelessness Matters Day is on Wednesday 18 April. #YHMD2018 is a national day of action held in communities and online to highlight the solutions to youth homelessness.

Melbourne youth homelessness experts will gather on YHMD at Melbourne City Mission’s Frontyard Youth Services. Available for interview will be:

- Vicki Sutton, CEO, Melbourne City Mission
- Donna Bennett, CEO, Hope Street Youth and Family Services
- Jenny Smith, CEO, Council to Homeless Persons
- A number of young people who have experienced homelessness ‘

NB. The Queensland researchers will not be attending the Melbourne event.

Date: 18 April 2018

Time: 1:00pm

Location: Frontyard Youth Services, 19 King Street, Melbourne.

